GameFi Market

The gaming market is the fastest-growing form of entertainment globally.

In 2020, the global gaming market valuation was $177 billion and is expected to grow to $545 billion in 2028. In Q3 of 2021 the blockchain gaming market was valued at $2.5 billion in trading volume and is expected to grow to $50 billion in 2025.

Market Trends

Blockchain gaming is revamping the industry by turning the tables on the monopolistic console market, creating a multiverse, and making gaming more immersive for the consumer.

For players, blockchain gaming has the following key benefits:

- Digital property rights: in traditional games, players purchase digital items (e.g., skins in Fortnite) and then can really only use these items in-game. Through the creation of NFTs facilitated by blockchain technology, these purchases transform an expense into an asset, creating actual secondary value from these purchases.
- Provenance: virtual goods now have rich histories and individuality. Imagine being able to own the exact, signed gun skin your favorite esports players used to win the world championship.
- Security: The decentralized nature of most blockchains (e.g., Ethereum) means players don't need to trust any single developer. Their virtual goods can be provably scarce, highly secure goods operated on a cryptographic, decentralized backbone.
- Interoperability and composability: while it will take time, blockchain technology has the potential to allow interaction across ecosystems by leveraging existing building blocks. Imagine players wearing their Fortnite skins in League of Legends.
- Increased financialization: players can use their virtual items like traditional assets as collateral for usage in DeFi. For example, a player could secure financing for their next battle pass by lending out their high-end weapon.
- Financial alignment in game economies: gamers can now participate in the economics of games they love. Developers can share a portion of their revenue with the game's supporters by issuing tokens.
